This study was designed to investigate the ameliorative effects of buthylated hydroxytoluene (BHT) against the deleterious effect of cyclophosphamide (CP) on fertility in female rats. Forty sexually mature female rats (Sprague-Dawley) were randomly divided into 4 equal groups; group 1 received physiological saline, group 2 received CP (200 mg/kg) in saline, group 3 received BHT (50 mg/kg) in saline, and group 4 received CP+BHT (50+50 mg/kg). After 10 days of treatment, the ovarian weights were recorded, and blood samples were collected from all the groups for the estimation of serum follicle stimulating hormone (FSH), luteinizing hormone (LH), and estradiol (E2). All the animals were mated with healthy males after 10 days of last treatment. A normal pregnancy was considered as one in which an increase in the uterine weight after delivery and an increase in the litter size in each pregnancy cycle was noted. Data analysis revealed that there was a significant decrease in the number of pregnant female rats as well as an increase in the pregnancy loss in CP-treated female rats as compared to the controls. Treatment with BHT alone did not affect the number of pregnant female rats or pregnancy loss. However, BHT significantly restored the decreased number of pregnant female rats and reduced the pregnancy loss in CP-treated rats. In addition, it was observed that CP administration resulted in a significant reduction in the ovarian weight and serum FSH, LH, and E2 levels. These effects were markedly ameliorated by BHT treatment. These results demonstrate that BHT prevents the decline in ovarian and pituitary function and the uterine growth associated with CP-induced toxicity in the female rats.The problem of mechanical failure of a polymeric membrane is
